FOOD ADDITIVE

04

Recently, the National Health Commission and the State Administration for Market Regulation issued 50 national food safety standards and 9 standard amendments. It is clearly stated that it is no longer allowed to use terms such as "no addition" and "zero addition" to place special emphasis on food ingredients. "No addition" is a description of the production process and is not completely equivalent to the content of ingredients or components in the final food product. The prohibition of using "zero addition" and "no addition" for pre-packaged foods is to enable consumers to correctly understand food label information, choose food more scientifically and independently, and avoid consumers blindly paying attention to promotional terms and ignoring the true attributes of the product, which poses potential risks to food safety and health.
